A Personal Update From Mark Adams

In the last few months, I'm sure many of you have noticed I'm having trouble with my voice. I've been diagnosed with Muscle Tension Dysphonia. It's one of the most common vocal disorders and many aspects of my life are consistent with the typical person who experiences it. This is a condition both induced and exacerbated by stress factors to which my body responds by tightening the muscles around my voice box. Instead of speaking with my vocal cords, I end up speaking with everything except my vocal cords, hence the raspiness.

As you can imagine, for a professional communicator, it's a very frustrating battle. The good news is that many people with my condition respond well to therapy. I had worked with a speech therapist some last year with success. Unfortunately, I have regressed in recent months. I am now a few weeks in with a new speech therapist and am optimistic that I will improve, and I think I have some already. As far as you can expect, I will probably continue to sound better in some settings than in others. It will be gradual progress, not a quick fix.

In telling you about my condition, respectfully, I am not requesting a weekly response from everyone on how I sounded--I can promise you I'm already aware of it. I would be glad to have you pray for the success of my therapy because this has been a true thorn in my flesh which hinders my effectiveness.

Thanks especially for your patience with me as I work through this.

~Mark
